The effects of vitamin D deficiency on liver function are reviewed. Although mechanisms of action of vitamin D remain unknown, it has been demonstrated that vitamin D deficiency causes hypercalcaemia and hypercalciuria in man. It has been established that the kidneys are the key to the synthesis of 1,25-(OH)₂-vitamin D₃, but hepatic production is also important, and appears to be stimulated by an inhibitory factor produced by cells of the monocyte-histiocytic series. Vitamin D deficiency is a common condition in the general population, particularly in Western countries. With the increasing popularity of physical and sports activities in developing countries, it is likely that vitamin D deficiency will become more common in these areas, too. It has been reported that a high prevalence of rickets is still found in rural areas of China and India. This suggests that vitamin D deficiency could be the cause of rickets and osteomalacia, which are common problems in these areas. The common problem of rickets could be a major public health issue in the world. | "project_info": { "project_number": "799832176516", "project_id": "1049919108460", "project_url": "", "number": "47", "label": "Cactus" }, "pipeline_info": { "pipeline_type": "machine_learning" }, "user_info": { "login": "thepete", "id": 1426, "avatar_url": "", "gravatar_id": "", "f678ea9f9e
